The first is that all are without exception sinners. He later rewrote these articles into his book on the topic. The Consequence Argument is based on a fundamental distinction between the past and the future.

While it is intelligible to ask whether a man willed to do what he did, it is incoherent to ask whether he willed to do what he did, if he did not will to do what he did. One thing is for sure, he obliterates the Pelagian concept of Libertarian free will. Similarly, according to Beta, if no one has, or ever had, Freedom of the Will, any choice about p being true, and no one has, or ever had, any choice that p entails q then no one has, or ever had, any choice about whether q is true.
