These dramatic companies have had strange difficulties to overcome, not only difficulties of scenery and properties, which in many oases they have had to set to work to make themselves out of any odds and ends of wood, canvas and paint they could beg, borrow, OT otherwise acquire from the armies to whom they were ministering, but difficulties of personnel. Although all three points of view are necessary to enrich our understanding of the complexity of Keats' work, it is the third dimension – the inner child – that brings us to the center of Keats' artistry, an artistry awakened by the child archetype, colored by the ideal child, but ultimately shaped by the dynamism of the inner child.
